Bismillah-ir-Rahman-ir-Rahim...

My name is Muhammad Zubair. And no, I am not a scholar, nor do I consider myself a philosopher. I am just a regular person, someone who has been on a journey of self-discovery, transformation, and awakening. I'm writing this book to share my story and to raise awareness among the Muslim youth about the hidden truths of music that many of us fail to recognize.

For years, I was like many others—believing that music was harmless, believing that music has scientific benefits. But what I discovered changed my perspective completely.

This book isn't here to force you to change your beliefs or make you see things the way I do. It's simply about opening your eyes to a truth that has been hidden from us for so long. A truth so powerful that if the world truly understood it, the entire multi-billion-dollar music industry would collapse overnight.

I share my story not because I am perfect or have all the answers, but because I've been there. I've struggled with the addiction to music, and I've seen the transformative power of turning to Allah and His guidance. My hope is that, through my journey, you will find the strength to overcome the temptations of music and seek the tranquility that comes from a closer connection with Allah.

May this book serve as a reminder that life without music is not only possible but liberating. May Allah guide you on this journey, grant you the strength to overcome any addiction, and lead you to the path of true peace and happiness.

Ameen.

The Illusion of Music

Music gives a fleeting peace,
A moment's calm, a soft release.
But in its melody, there lies deceit,
It numbs the soul, it skips a beat.

It stirs the senses, tempts the mind,
But leaves the conscience far behind.
An escape it offers, brief and sweet,
A hiding place, where truth can't meet.

The fools may dance, the fools may sing,
But in the end, what does it bring?
A fleeting joy, a hollow sound,
And in its wake, the soul is bound.

Chapter 1

Music solves the problems?

Think about it: when was the last time you didn't have music playing in the background? Reels, Shorts or even in a Whatsapp status video. Music is everywhere. It's a part of our daily lives in ways we don't even realize.

When we sit to write our college notes or boring assignments, the first thought is, "Let's play some music; it'll help me write." When we go jogging, we feel like we need music in our ears to keep us moving. At the gym, workouts seem incomplete without loud beats in the background.

Even when we are feeling emotional, we turn to music. If we are sad, we listen to slow, emotional songs to match our mood. It feels like we can't face our emotions without it. Music has become more than just entertainment. It's something we depend on.

Cleaning the house feels boring without music.

Long drives seem incomplete without a playlist.

Even sitting alone feels strange if it's too quiet. It's like we can't handle silence anymore.

I still remember those days when my life was consumed by stress and anxiety. There was no hope. During those days, Arijit Singh's songs became my life saver. I'd listen to music for hours, and it felt like magic—it made me feel better. whenever sadness hit, I'd press play, and for a while, I felt relief.

But over time, I began to notice a pattern. Even for the smallest setbacks or disappointments, I would turn to music for comfort. That's when I started questioning myself: Why do we turn to music in every aspect of life? Is it because we genuinely enjoy it, or are we using it to fill a void?

Imagine a day without music—could we truly handle it, or would we feel restless? This made me wonder: are we really solving our problems, or just making more problems for us?

Chapter 2

Wait, Maybe Music is a Problem?

Music is powerful. When we listen to it, we can easily get lost in it. The rhythm, the lyrics, the beat—everything feels good, almost like an escape from the real world. But while music makes us feel better for a while, it also takes us to a fake world where everything seems perfect, even when it's not. The problem is, when we get lost in that fake world, it becomes harder to face the real world and accept the truth.

Think about it. Have you ever listened to a love song and found yourself imagining a perfect romance? A boy might listen to a romantic song and picture himself with his dream girl, fantasizing about every detail—how they meet, how they laugh together, how their love story unfolds. Similarly, a girl may hear a love song and imagine her prince charming coming to sweep her off her feet, living a fairy tale life that doesn't exist. For a few minutes, music lets them live in that fantasy, away from the reality of loneliness or unfulfilled relationships.

It's the same with students, especially those struggling with exams like NEET, JEE, UPSC, etc. When a student fails or feels defeated, what do they do? They turn to motivational songs or success anthems. They start imagining themselves as successful—thinking that they've already aced the exam with full marks. The beat of the song and the uplifting lyrics make them feel like a winner, even though the harsh truth is they haven't even started studying for the next exam. They're not taking any real steps toward success; instead, they're getting lost in a fantasy of imagined accomplishments.

Even more common is how music can create fantasies of wealth. Imagine a poor person listening to a song that talks about luxury, success, and wealth. For a few minutes, they can forget about their financial struggles and imagine themselves as rich. They fantasize about driving fancy cars, living in grand houses, and enjoying a life of abundance. But when the song ends, so does the fantasy, and the harsh reality hits. They're still stuck in the same place, still struggling with the same financial issues, but now, they're even further away from addressing them because they've been lost in a dream.

The danger of these musical daydreams is that they take us further from accepting reality. The more we listen to these songs and lose ourselves in these fantasies, the harder it becomes to face the truth. A student who imagines passing the exam through music may delay the real work of studying. The poor person who imagines being rich might spend time dreaming instead of working toward financial independence. The boy/girl who imagines living with their dream girl or prince charming may spend more time fantasizing about the perfect relationship rather than focusing on personal growth. These imagined scenarios create a false sense of comfort, and in the end, if they don't find their "prince charming" or "dream girl," they may feel disappointed or depressed.

Music makes us feel good for a moment, but it's not the real solutions to the problems we face. It only make the gap between our dreams and reality wider, because when we wake up from the fantasy, we feel even worse than before.

By getting lost in these imaginary worlds created by music, we train ourselves to avoid dealing with the challenges in front of us. The more we escape into the music, the harder it becomes to face the uncomfortable truths about our lives. It's as if we're choosing to stay in a dream because the real world feels too difficult or overwhelming. But here's the truth: the longer we stay in that fake world, the more we delay making real changes in our lives. The music doesn't fix anything. It just keeps us in a loop of distractions.

"Music does not heal; it only convinces the mind to ignore the illness."

Chapter 3

But science says music is good!

Now you might question me, "Ok Zubair, we agree that music can be a problem. But what about science? Doesn't research show that music has a lot of benefits?" Here's where I want to clear up one of the biggest misconceptions about music.

So, when we talk about the science of music, we often hear that it has benefits for our mind, body, and even our soul. But here's the key point—science isn't talking about the modern-day songs that we hear or play on our playlists. The studies that show music's therapeutic effects are mostly referring to certain types of music, like classical, binaural beats, or natural sounds. These are the types of music that have been shown to positively impact our brain and well-being.

For instance, natural sounds—like the sound of rain, ocean waves, or birds chirping. These kinds of sounds have been proven to reduce anxiety and promote relaxation. They create a peaceful environment that encourages mental clarity and emotional balance. Nature sounds are widely used in stress-relief practices like meditation, mindfulness, etc.

The Issue with Modern Songs.....

But modern-day songs, especially the ones we hear in popular culture, (“Tu Maan meri jaan” or “husan Tera tauba tauba”) type of songs are not scientifically proven to have the same benefits. In Fact some studies suggest that these types of music can increase anxiety and restlessness, because of fast-paced, loud and having complex beats. There is no benefit at all in them. Many of the popular songs today focus on shallow emotions—love, heartbreak, or partying. These songs are designed to entertain, but they often have no deeper impact on our mental well-being. In fact, the lyrics of most of the modern songs can perpetuate unrealistic expectations or negative thinking, especially when they deal with themes like heartbreak, loneliness, or materialism.

Music killed Antony Wayne.....

One of the lesser-discussed but deeply troubling aspects of music is its potential to cause psychological distress through earworms. Earworms, also known as "stuck song syndrome," occur when a song or melody gets stuck in your mind, replaying on a loop. While this might seem like a harmless annoyance at first, for some individuals, it can escalate to severe mental health issues.

A tragic example is the case of Antony Wayne from 2020. Antony, a 42-year-old British man, reportedly took his own life after battling months of torment caused by a persistent earworm. He described the sensation as "unbearable" and "inescapable," with a particular song playing over and over in his head, leaving him unable to sleep, concentrate, or find peace. His condition worsened over time, leading to depression and a sense of hopelessness.

Modern music, with its repetitive beats and catchy hooks, is particularly prone to causing earworms. These songs are designed to stick in your head, often through repetitive choruses or phrases.

So from now when you hear people say, “Music is scientifically proven to be good for you,” remember to ask: What kind of music are we talking about?

The "therapeutic effects of music" everyone talks about? They're not about your favorite arjit sing or anuv Jain song.
Next time you hear "music heals," remember: they're talking about natural music, not instagram's trending songs.

the more I am convinced that music is the most effective way of spreading immorality."

Chapter 4

What if I listen to good music?

So at this point, some might argue, "What if I listen to good music, and in moderation?" Well, let's stop right there. Do you really think there's any "good" music available on the internet? Unfortunately, you won't be able to find a single song out there that doesn't carry negative influences or underlying harmful messages.

Good Music?

Even if the music appears to be positive, it can still be a form of brainwashing, subtly shaping your mindset in ways you might not even realize. For instance, some songs might sound harmless, but they still carry spiritual risks. Take the popular song "Ya Ali Madad Ali" as an example. You might say the lyrics aren't promoting anything bad. But if we take a closer look, we realize that this is a form of shirk (associating others with Allah's power).

In Surah Al-Fatiha (1:5), we are taught: "You alone we worship, and You alone we ask for help."

Listening in Moderation?

Some might argue, "I'll just listen to music in moderation, once in a while." But here's the thing: anything that is addictive can never truly be good. You can't say, "I'll just listen to music a few times, and it won't affect me." It doesn't work like that. There will come a time when you start craving it more, and gradually, you won't be able to leave it behind.

Even if you find a song with good lyrics, no shirk, and no haram content, there's still an issue.

Just like alcohol is haram,

Fornication is haram,

Music is also haram...

"Music is an escape, a temporary illusion. Fools use it to hide from reality, avoiding the truth."

-Ex-Musician Junaid Jamshed

Chapter 5

The Clear Evidence That Music is Haram

As we journey through understanding music's impact on our lives, we must also address an important question: What does Islam say about music? Is it simply a matter of personal preference, or does religion provide clear guidance? In this chapter, we will explore the evidence from the Qur'an, Hadith, and scholarly consensus that confirms music is haram (forbidden) in Islam.

The Qur'an and Vain Speech....

In the Qur'an, we find references to "vain speech" (Laghw al-Hadith), which some scholars interpret as a reference to music.

Music, with its distracting and often shallow content, can draw people away from their spiritual duties and the remembrance of Allah.

One of the most cited verses in this context is from Surah Luqman (31:6), where Allah warns about idle talk:

"And of mankind is he who purchases idle talk (Laghw al-Hadith) to mislead others from the path of Allah without knowledge, and who takes it in mockery. For such there will be a humiliating punishment."

The term "idle talk" refers to anything that diverts a person from their higher purpose. Music, with its distracting and sometimes superficial themes, can be seen as such an idle distraction that leads us away from more meaningful pursuits, including worship and reflection on the Qur'an.

Hadith of the Muhammad (s.w.s).....

The Prophet Muhammad (PBUH) spoke directly about musical instruments in several hadiths, making it clear that their use is discouraged. One famous narration from Sahih Bukhari mentions musical instruments along with other forbidden actions:

"There will be among my followers, people who will consider illegal sexual intercourse, the wearing of silk, the drinking of alcoholic drinks, and the use of musical instruments as lawful."

(Sahih Bukhari, Volume 7, Book 69, Hadith 494)

This hadith draws a parallel between music and other serious prohibitions in Islam, such as alcohol and illicit sexual behavior, indicating that music falls into the category of things that can mislead believers and degrade their spiritual well-being.

Another narration further emphasizes the harm of music, comparing it to moral and spiritual corruption:

"There will be among my followers, people who will be turned into apes and pigs and they will be punished with severe punishment. They are the ones who will abandon the religion and follow the ways of others and indulge in music and drinking."

(Sahih Muslim, Book 24, Hadith 5300)

These strong words underscore the negative consequences of engaging with music, suggesting that it can lead one away from faith and to moral degradation.

Ibn Qudamah, a prominent Hanbali scholar, stated:

"There is no difference of opinion among the scholars of Islam that musical instruments are haram. This has been a clear consensus."

Opinions of Imams....

The Madhab of Imam Abu Hanifa is among the most critical and harshest quotes on music. Imam Abu Hanifa's students clearly declared musical instruments haram and anyone who listens to it is considered a fasiq whose testimony is not accepted.

Some went on to say that listening to music is fisq (astray) and enjoying it is kufr. They used weak hadith to support that statement.

Ibn Qudamah, who is considered among the biggest Imam of the Hanbali Madhabs, said, "Musical instruments are haram like guitar, trumpets, flutes, drums and so on. Whoever continues to listen to it, his testimony (sahadah) is rejected.

And then he goes on to say, "If one goes to a wedding with prohibition like alcohol musical instrument and can forbid evil then he must otherwise he should not attend."

Shaytan"

Chapter 6

Life Is Possible Without Music

Alhamdulillah, you've reached this part of the book, and I'm grateful for the opportunity to share my personal journey of how and why I decided to quit music.

First, let me tell you something about myself: I've always been a huge fan of art in all its forms. Whether it's acting, dancing, singing, making videos, filming movies, or writing books, I've always had a deep connection with creativity. Music, in particular, was something I cherished. For many years, I believed that music was a gift—a miracle of human expression. If I could go back and tell my past self that I would one day quit music, I would have laughed in disbelief. But here I am, having left it all behind.

So, how did I reach this point?.....

The journey to quitting music began back in my school days, when my English teacher introduced a new chapter: "A Thing of Beauty is a Joy Forever" by John Keats. The poem talks about how true beauty never fades. For example, the joy we find in nature is enduring and timeless, but material things like wealth or possessions offer fleeting happiness. The joy they bring eventually fades away.

That idea planted a seed in my mind. I realized that music, too, was a temporary joy—something I would play on repeat, getting bored after hearing the same song for the fifth or sixth time. Here's a question for you as well. How many times can you listen to a same songs and don't get bored? 5 times, 10 times, 15 times or maybe in your case more than that. But there will come a time when you will hate the music you loved the most. Just because you can't listen to the same music your entire life. These thoughts helped me to realise that music is not a beautiful art form because the joy fades away after 5th or 6th plays.

Then, I thought about Surah Al-Fatiha, a prayer that I recite more than 30 times each day. Despite saying it so many times, I've never grown tired of it. Every time I recite it in prayer, it feels fresh, new, and full of meaning. The beauty and depth of those words never fade, they continue to nourish my soul.

The Struggle Phase.....

Deciding to quit music was not easy. While I understood the truth, I wasn't immediately ready to accept it. My mind wanted to quit, but my heart and habits weren't prepared for that change. I didn't know how to quit, but I began searching for ways to overcome my addiction. And to my surprise, one day I realized it had been five months since I last listened to music. I was stunned. How did this happen? Had I time-traveled? Was it a dream? I tried to remember the last time I listened to music, but it was unclear. Then I remembered—it was after Ramadan that I had stopped.

The Best Way to Quit Music Addiction.....

What I've learned from my journey is that overcoming sins requires a strong commitment and energy to resist. Music, like other harmful behaviors, invites Satan's influence. But in the month of Ramadan, the influence of Satan is restricted. The Prophet (peace be upon him) said: “When Ramadan begins, the gates of Paradise are opened, the gates of Hell are closed, and the devils are chained up.” (Al-Bukhari, Hadith 3277; Muslim, Hadith 1079). This helped me realize that during Ramadan, the doors to goodness open, and it becomes easier to make positive changes.

Another crucial lesson I learned was the importance of seeking knowledge. As they say, “The more we seek knowledge and truth, the less we seek entertainment.” I found that by immersing myself in learning—whether it was through reading the Qur'an, exploring new skills, or creating positive content like helpful quotes and videos—I was able to shift my focus from fleeting pleasures to lasting growth. Once you fall in love with the spiritual world, nothing on this planet will seem as appealing. Once you start doing good then the bads will start fading.

Allah says, “Verily, the good deeds remove the evil deeds” (Hud 11:114).

Nothing will happen if you keep counting the days on the calendar, marking how many days you’ve avoided music, you’ll never truly quit. Instead of saying, 'I will quit listening to music,' start telling yourself, 'I am not a music addict, and I have never listened to music.' Believe it, and watch the change happen.

If musicians who have dedicated their entire lives to music can quit and live better lives without it, then who are we to say that living without music is impossible? They have proven that ‘LIFE WITHOUT MUSIC IS POSSIBLE’

“Do not look at the smallness of the sin, but at the greatness of the One you have disobeyed.”
